ON THE COVER

Mature woman, portrait. Although women represent half of the world’s population, much of the medical literature has focused predominantly on males. We have been slow to appreciate the differences in normal physiology, as well as disease pathology, between men and women. In this special issue of Clinical Chemistry, which focuses on advancing women’s health, we explore recent studies involving determinants and detection of health outcomes that uniquely affect women, as well as the differences in risk between males and females for shared diseases. But be sure to look beyond the original research studies because every feature, from the Preamble at the beginning to the monthly Science in the Arts at the end, presents a unique and often refreshing angle on women’s health. ©Getty Images.
